WordPress Demystified – Security – Your Website Legals

Now we're talking about security and peace of mind, and one of the things we do need to talk about that which is often overlooked is all your legal documents. Now I am not a legal advisor in any way, shape, or form.

There are standard policies, a privacy policy that WordPress actually creates for you, a standard privacy page.

You need to go through that and look for yourself as to whether it's correct or not. There are cookie policies, especially depending on where your clients are. Because the great thing is that there are different policies for Australia, for the US, for different states in the US, and for the UK, and everywhere else in the world.

You want to check the terms and conditions of your website, the terms and conditions of your services or products as well. So this is all legal documentation.

There are free plugins that will do this for you. You do have to go through the plugins, or if you have somebody like me go through them, because I'm not a legal expert, you have to double-check everything I do.

Or you can go to legal experts. One who's Australian has a lot of legal documents and templates is Shalini, and she's Love Your Legals. She used to be Legally Shalini, she's now Love Your Legals. She has a lot of templates that you can buy that you can fill in, and I think she may even have sessions that you can talk to her about things if you're not sure. If you want something that really takes you step-by-step and covers loads of different countries, there's Termageddon.

I use Termageddon on my website. It also does cookie policies as well and privacy policies. It can also be a pain because it's a real stickler if you change things on your website. You have to go through it. The good thing is though that it updates it for all the different countries that you do.

You can have a privacy policy for Australia, another one for the UK, different ones if you're dealing with the US.

If you're dealing with just Australia, check out Love Your Legals with Shalini.

If you're dealing with a world, a more worldwide base, I would definitely check out Termageddon. It's not the end of the world when you use them.

Keep shining.
